5 ways to use memes with students

By Sharon Serano February 20, 2018

I love memes and enjoy sharing them on Facebook, Twitter or even emailing them to friends and coworkers. But until recently, it never occurred to me to use a meme generator, a fun communication tool, in the classroom.

For those who aren't familiar with them, memes (pronounced meemz) are a cultural element or system of behavior that is passed from one individual to another. They are often represented by an image with a brief bold caption overlaid and shared on social media to capture attention or elicit a quick laugh.

One night while working hard on my lesson plans, my 14-year-old son decided to poke fun at me by sending me a text with the following meme that he created:

 Meme 1

I had to laugh because it was so true. And in that moment, I had an epiphany. What if I asked my students to create math-themed memes? The next day I set out the criteria for The Math Meme Project:

- The memes had to be their own creations.
- They could be about any algebra topic or about my class in general.
- Students could submit up to three.
- They could submit their creations to my school email.
- They had three weeks to turn them in.
